Steve Troxler
Commissioner

Spring is here and with it the beginning of new growth and renewal.

As a farmer, I always look forward to breaking ground and planting, knowing that with a little luck, some patience and decent growing conditions, I could look forward to the harvest of my work.

A copy of Gov. Mike Easley's proposed budget for 2007-2008 reminded me of the wonders of planting seeds, growing crops and the anticipation of harvest.

Since taking office, I have planted a good many seeds regarding the need to help farmers stay on their land and earn a decent living so they can keep the land in production. I've referred to it as farmland preservation, but my vision focuses on keeping farmland as working land, not as development or just open space.

I am optimistic that this will be the year we begin to see a harvest from these efforts. Gov. Easley included $6 million for the Agricultural Development and Farmland Preservation Trust Fund in his proposed budget, a significant leap from zero funding in 2006-2007 and $50,000 in 2005-2006.

I appreciate the Governor's leadership on this issue and in recommending funding. There are many needs in the state, but I am grateful that he recognizes how important it is to invest in our agricultural and natural resources now while we can.

And I look at this as a particularly worthwhile investment in the future of agriculture and our state.

North Carolina green industry study findings announced: $8.6 billion impact

North Carolina's green industry contributes $8.6 billion to the state's economy, according to results of a study announced recently by Agriculture Commissioner Steve Troxler.

The green industry comprises growers of greenhouse/nursery stock, Christmas trees and flowers, sod producers, and related businesses such as landscape and irrigation contractors, lawn care professionals, arborists and retail lawn and garden centers.

"We always knew the green industry was big business in North Carolina, but we didn't know how big," Troxler said. "This comprehensive study shows that the green industry is a diversified and significant economic factor in our state."

Louise Hodges, president of the N.C. Green Industry Council, said: "These numbers clearly illustrate the significant contributions the green industry provides our state. Armed with this information, our industry will further its commitment to the state of North Carolina through opportunities for additional jobs, additional revenue and continued environmental benefits."

Staff of the Agricultural Statistics Division at the N.C. Department of Agriculture and Consumer Services collected data for the study. Economists Charles Safley and Michael Walden at N.C. State University's College of Agriculture and Life Sciences analyzed the data. The study was funded by a $150,000 appropriation from the General Assembly in 2005.

Following are highlights of the study, which examined data for 2005:

-- The green industry employs nearly 152,000 people across the state.

-- N.C. homeowners spent an average of $838 on lawn and landscape services during the year.

-- Arborists, landscapers and lawn care professionals had total gross sales of $1.2 billion.

-- Total gross sales by N.C. florists exceeded $256 million.

-- Landscape architects and designers had total gross sales of $574 million.

-- North Carolina had 120,741 acres in production of green-industry commodities, including 60,657 acres of Christmas trees, 27,150 acres of field-grown nursery stock and 20,838 acres of sod.

Farmers can gain tax benefits by donating food

Farmers who donated fresh produce to hunger-relief agencies are reminded that they can take a charitable tax deduction on their 2006 federal tax return. The benefit, provided for in the Pension Protection Act of 2006, allows farmers to deduct food that was donated between January and December 2006.

The allowed deduction is equal to the base cost of producing the food plus half the fair market value appreciation, not to exceed half the cost. For example, if it cost $100 to produce a container of potatoes and the grower would normally sell the container for $200, the tax deduction for donating the container of food is $150. The federal benefit remains in effect through December 2007. North Carolina has allowed a tax credit for donated food since 1983.

"This is a win-win for everyone involved, and I hope farmers who haven't participated in gleaning efforts before will be encouraged to participate this year," Agriculture Commissioner Steve Troxler said. "Not only is it the right thing to do, you can save money on your taxes, too."

Farmers can develop relationships directly with their local hunger-relief agencies, but those who do not want to collect and transport produce to a local food bank themselves can contact the Society of St. Andrew North Carolina to help with the work. SoSA has a network of volunteers and drivers who help move food from the fields and warehouses to partner agencies, and will provide a

Sowing seeds

For the second year in a row, North Carolina has led the country in the loss of farms. Land values are on the rise, and in some areas of the state the values are skyrocketing.

While that’s good for property owners, it also has its downside, too. Higher property values mean higher property taxes along with higher costs to buy or rent additional land for farming. These pressures often leave farmers with few choices but to sell. And I don’t blame them.

But some farmers, like myself, don’t want to sell off their family farms and would prefer to continue to work the land.

Some of the efforts of the Agricultural Development and Farmland Preservation Trust Fund are designed to help make it easier for farmers who want to keep working their lands.

Working farms are important to maintaining our ability to feed ourselves. They also provide natural habitat for wildlife and clean air and water for us all.

There is still a lot of work to do before a final budget is approved. The Governor’s proposal will be debated by members of the General Assembly before a final version is agreed on, but farmland preservation funding has support in the legislature as well. In fact, legislators have introduced a bill recommending $10 million for the trust fund.

I encourage farmers to contact their legislators and talk to them about the importance of farmland preservation and the environmental benefits of keeping farmland in production versus covering land with concrete, homes and businesses.

I will keep you informed on the budget and other legislative issues as they develop.

Speaking of land loss, I want to briefly mention the debate about the Navy’s proposal to build an outlying landing field in Washington County and why I have encouraged the Navy to consider an alternative location.

The project is expected to affect 30,000 acres of farmland through acquisition and use restrictions. Currently, almost 90 percent of the land proposed for this landing field is used for production agriculture, including 17,000 acres of corn and soybeans.

Taking this land out of production is estimated to cause agricultural losses of up to $6 million annually, which is significant to the local economy and the businesses and jobs supported by farming operations in the northeastern part of the state.

Without question I support the service and sacrifice of our country’s military men and women. My father and his three brothers served in World War II, and I appreciate the freedoms we have because of their service and others like them.

But at a time when we are losing so many farms, taking 30,000 acres out of production is at odds with the need to keep farmland open for production. I believe it is also in opposition to our long-term goals to become more energy independent.

I hope the Navy will reconsider its plan and work with the state to find other site options.

Horse owners urged to fill out horse survey on feed purchases

The N.C. Department of Agriculture and Consumer Services and the N.C. Horse Council is calling on horse owners for help with a short survey to try to determine how much feed owners are purchasing annually and where they are buying that feed.

Revenue from an equine feed assessment that is used to promote the horse industry has been on the decline since 2003 despite a growth in the horse population in the state.

“The numbers don’t add up and we are trying to determine where the break down is occurring,” said Steve Lathrop, NCDA&CS interim horse specialist. “The money generated by the assessment is critical to the work of the N.C. Horse Council in promoting, lobbying and educating about the state’s growing horse industry.”

Under the assessment, horse owners pay $2 per ton for horse feed, which is collected at retail outlets. Those funds are then forwarded to NCDA&CS as pass-through revenue for the Horse Council. NCDA&CS doesn’t collect any fees from the revenue.

Horse owners are being asked to fill out a short five-question survey that can be found at <http://www.ncagr.com/markets/livestock/horse/feedsurvey/index.htm>.

To request a copy of the survey to fill out, call Lathrop at (919) 733-7887.

Now is the time to evaluate nitrogen needs of wheat

Now is the time for farmers to be thinking about nitrogen fertilization of wheat. The N.C. Department of Agriculture and Consumer Services reminds growers to watch their crop closely and be ready to collect tissue samples at the appropriate stage of growth. A tissue test is the only reliable way to determine the correct amount of nitrogen to apply.

Tissue samples should be taken when wheat reaches Zadoks growth stage 30 (or the equivalent Feekes 4–5 stage). Check the growth stage by digging up a plant and slicing it down the middle. If the distance from the bottom of the plant to the top of the seed head is one-half inch, then it is time to submit a tissue sample to the NCDA&CS Agronomic Division laboratory.

To take a sample, use a pair of clippers or a sharp knife and collect the entire above-ground portion of the plant. Cut or clip the leaves about a half-inch above the ground to minimize soil particles clinging to the tissue. Also remove any dead tissue. A good sample consists of two handfuls of wheat plants collected randomly from 15 to 20 places throughout a field. The tissue sampling process is depicted online at www.ncagr.com/agronomi/pictorial.htm.

Put the sample in a paper bag or plant tissue envelope provided by NCDA&CS. Do not use plastic bags. Fill out the Plant Sample Information sheet, and be sure to write down the exact Zadoks, or Feekes, growth stage. Ship the sample(s) along with the completed Plant Sample Information sheet(s) and appropriate processing fee to the NCDA&CS laboratory.

The NCDA&CS Agronomic Division processes tissue samples within three days of their arrival at the lab. The quickest way to get test results is to visit the division’s Web site, www.ncagr.com/agronomi/, and select “Find Your Report” on the left side of the page. Reports are also mailed to growers and their advisers.

For additional information or assistance, contact your NCDA&CS regional agronomist. To find the regional agronomist assigned to your area, visit www.ncagr.com/agronomi/rahome.htm, or call Kent Messick at (919) 733-2655.

Africanized honeybees pose greater threat to European bees and livestock

State developing plan to protect bee industry if Africanized bees arrive in N.C.

Albert Einstein once said, “If the bee disappeared off the surface of the globe, then man would only have four years left to live.”

According to an article in the March 2000 issue of Bee Culture magazine, honeybees are responsible for one-third of everything that people eat every day. North Carolina’s bee-dependent crops include apples, blueberries, cucumbers, pumpkins, squash, strawberries and watermelons.

That puts a lot of pressure on beekeepers who are already battling a mysterious illness that is killing some of the honeybee population. Now the African honeybee is entering into the mix. African honeybees, often sensationalized as “killer bees,” are spreading from Florida and Texas to neighboring states such as Louisiana and Arkansas.

“The fact that they have invaded Arkansas, which shares similar environmental conditions to North Carolina, demonstrates their ability to adapt to conditions here,” said Don Hopkins, state apiarist with the N.C. Department of Agriculture and Consumer Sciences.

State bee specialists such as Hopkins say there is no cause for alarm in North Carolina yet. But informing the public and beekeepers about the benefits of the European honeybee and the relatively low risk of deaths from African honeybee stings is a proactive way to address this problem.

Yearly death rates from bee stings are far lower than from lightning strikes, yet public fear of bee attacks is pervasive. This suggests that the Africanized bee “threat” is more perceived than real.

When they do arrive in North Carolina, the state’s frontline defense lies with bee experts such as Hopkins and beekeepers who manage the genetics of their colonies to create a genetic buffer between humans and the feral African honeybee population. The N.C. Africanized Honey Bee Task Force is working on a comprehensive response plan consisting of education, quarantine and research components. The initial action plan available on the Web at <http://www.ncahb.com>.

Unlike the European honeybee, African bees are indiscriminate in their nesting sites. “Any small cavity that would be not much larger than a gallon is ideal. An old bucket, a tree cavity or water meter boxes are a favorite around homes. Anything with a cavity of up to 3 liters or larger,” Hopkins said.

Spring is the prime time for honeybees to test potential sites. “If you have a hole in the wall or tree cavity that looks inviting to a colony and you see that kind of ‘snooping’ activity near the area, seal it up with duct tape, insulating foam or a screen to make that area unavailable,” Hopkins said.

“If someone notices a colony being established, then do something sooner rather than later,” he said. “The best advice to give people who suspect they have a colony of African honeybees on their property is to call a bee specialist or the N.C. Department of Agriculture and Consumer Sciences Plant Industry Division at (919) 233-8214. “Avoid dealing with the bees. Most people who have been attacked by African bees were aware that a colony existed on their property for several weeks,” Hopkins said.

In 2006, SoSA worked with 600 individual farmers, up from 417 in 2002. In the same five-year period, partner agencies increased from 1,542 to 2,266, indicating there is a greater need for food assistance in the state.

“We glean surplus produce in any volume. From the car load to the tractor-trailer load, Society of St. Andrew gleans whatever is edible,” said Julia Webb Bowden, director of SoSA-NC in Durham. “We will go into the fields and pick out everything left behind and then put it in 10-pound bags, or we can move bulk or packaged produce that has been in the warehouse.

“Too big, too small, too ugly, while it doesn’t sell well in a grocery store, fills a hungry belly just as well as perfectly uniform produce,” she added.

The N.C. Department of Agriculture and Consumer Services works with Second Harvest Food Banks and SoSA to transport produce. “We try to move as much produce as we can for SoSA, using federal funding from The Emergency Food Assistance Program,” said Gary Gay, director of the NCDA&CS Food Distribution Division. “In the 2005-2006 fiscal year, the Food Distribution Division helped SoSA distribute more than 3.3 million pounds of produce.”

Farmers, restaurants and other businesses

Volunteers, of all sizes, bag potatoes that were stored in warehouses during the winter.

with leftover food can contact the Society of St. Andrew toll-free at (866) 453-2662 or call the Food Distribution Division’s Food Donation Hotline, (888) 498-3449, to find a local hunger-relief agency.

Farmers are encouraged to talk to their tax adviser about the benefits of donating produce. Farmers are protected from liability through the Emerson Good Samaritan Food Donation Act.
